Excerpt: .them for fancy prices, and transferring the experiments from nursery to the farm, compelling the farmer to test the quality of the tree bought, and thus leaving him about one chance in one hundred of winning. Had our nurserymen planted our hardiest tmerican varieties instead of going off after the Russian craze, our cellars might have been filled with apples to-day. The Russian craze was a bad thing for orchards. During the year 1884-85 Missouri and Michigan suffered at the same time but they did not weaken or go to Russia for new varieties. If we had ollowed their example and planted the best American varieties, we would have winter apples in large quantities. We should have studied more into the best methods of acclimating our fruit trees in northern Iowa, and this, with good care, good conditions and cultivation, would have solved the...
