Excerpt: . . . in common, tenant in coparcenary, or joint tenant, dies intestate, . his or her estate shall be divided equally, and c. And if the part had taken this form, it would have included the sense, if not almost the very operative words, of the act aforesaid of 1828. And one or more of said joint tenants may depart this life during the existence of said estate, the title or interest of the deceased joint tenant, and c. shall be distributed, and c. These are the operative words of that act. It must follow, that if the act of 1828 was sufficient to abolish this doctrine of the survivorship among joint tenants, then the above quoted part of the Constitution of 1777, was also sufficient to abolish the doctrine, and therefore, it must follow, that this part of the Constitution of 17 77, did abolish...
