One circumstance above all militated sadly against Kitty's ideas of a heroine; she had once or twice broken abruptly on the sacred privacy of Marie's sorrow, and had neither found her clasping her hands in speechless agony, nor weeping over a picture, nor hugging a letter to her bosom, but had actually detected her in repairing, diligently and neatly, the damaged wardrobe of her sister. She cannot be so very unhappy, said the romantic Catherine, or she would not be always trying to learn English, mending her clothes, and bustling about our improvement. She's just like one of us after all. A common observer of character, who had known Marie and Catherine when they first emerged from childhood, would...
