Thirty-five. Anna. Many of the activities which the school should use as a natural basis of arithmetic work are those in which the pupils are engaged outside of school. We believe that it is the foremost function of the school to teach the child to do efficiently, or better than he could do without such guidance and instruction, those things which he is trying to do and wishes to do in the home, in his play, etc. This it can do only if it utilizes the child s own experiences and activities as the basis of teaching. Such appeal to the pupil s present activities not only enables him to do better those things which make up his life in the present, but also provides the best kind of development as preparation for his future. Among the free activities of children outside of school that may thus be continued in the school room is the playing of various kinds of games, which is the main business of childhood. These games are of several different types. Some involve the principle of contest, and include various scoring games. Others involve imitation of real community activities, such as keeping store, playing fireman, etc. Other games are primarily games of activity, such as, Pussy wants a corner. The idea of utilizing so-called number games in school is now generally accepted, and this type of mathematical work is done...
